My father who I had not seen since before the summer in northern Ireland went for his usual walk in the evenings and was found lying on his side in the gorse bushes behind our house with a bad heart attack. When I went back home the next day I said I will call you dad and when I dialed the phone he answered. Mom and Dad both fell very ill and I was very frightened. But Dad's own doctor told him that if he went on working all the time and we would keep him in good health for him he was not going to die. He said Dad should stop being a miner and be a teacher and write books like George Bernard Shaw and he could go on living as long as he wanted and he could get old and we wouldn't have to worry about him any more. Dad took that advice and he and Mom wrote two books and Dad taught for a while and they were very happy. One day there was an interview on a radio program and the question was asked what were you doing with yourself in the late years of your life. And Dad said he was writing books and his wife said he should be living with her as she is much younger than he is and how can he live with her if he is dead. And then Dad answered that he wasn't dead and he was only asleep and he would wake up when his time came. Interrater reliability of DSM-III-R and ICD-10: results of the American National Institute of Mental Health's Collaborative Genetic Study of Mood Disorder. The authors estimated the extent to which agreement among clinicians and researchers on diagnoses in a sample of 472 adult cases with mood disorders was influenced by level of training, diagnosis, and severity. Interrater reliability was modest (unweighted kappa [kappa] =.57-.59) for both the Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders, Third Edition, Revised (DSM-III-R) and International Statistical Classification of Diseases, 10th Revision (ICD-10) diagnoses, and was higher for the latter. Reliability was relatively high for bipolar disorder and unipolar depression (DSM-III-R: kappa =.73 82157476af
